(b) Description of the Related Art Liquid crystal display (LCD) devices control the light transmittance of liquid crystal cells in accordance with video signals to display video. LCD devices are thinner and lighter than cathode ray tubes (CRTs), have high resolution, and are implemented on a wide variety of information processing devices and TVs because of these characteristics. However, while the LCD devices have these characteristics, they are not as bright as CRTs and are not suitable for outdoor use since they have backlights. A technology for rendering LCD devices usable in outdoor environments has been developed in recent years. The most widely used LCD technology is Twisted Nematic (TN) LCD, in which liquid crystal molecules are twisted 90 degrees between an upper substrate and a lower substrate to control light transmittance. Such an LCD device has an aperture ratio of only about 20%, which deteriorates the brightness. To overcome these problems, LCD devices having new modes have been developed. One of these new modes is In-Plane Switching (IPS) LCD, which was developed in Japan in the late 1980s. In the IPS LCD device, the liquid crystal molecules are arranged in a horizontal direction with respect to the substrates, and are driven by applying a transverse electric field in the substrates. LCD devices using the IPS technology have a higher transmittance and faster response speed than conventional TN LCDs. As described above, the existing LCD devices have numerous problems such as large size and low image quality. To improve the light transmittance of the LCD devices, the vertical alignment (VA) LCD, in which the liquid crystal molecules are arranged vertically to the substrates, has been developed. VA LCD devices, however, have poor viewing angle characteristics, i.e., a decrease in the contrast ratio with the viewing angle. Furthermore, in the VA LCD devices, since the liquid crystal molecules in the liquid crystal layer are aligned in a plurality of directions, the liquid crystal display device displays images at a double speed, and this phenomenon is called image sticking.Q: How to display a list of values from a function and update the GUI in another function I am trying to create a simple Java swing GUI for my java program.
