Can the practices of health care professionals be improved? An intervention study on wound treatment. The work area of health care professionals is often surrounded by unknown stressors that may affect the quality of their work. In this study, factors in the work environment, as well as the quality of the patient's health condition, are considered. The aim of the study is to investigate if the situation of health care professionals can be improved by means of an intervention project. With an intervention study, we focus on specific and experimentally proven problems in health care professions. For us, it is important to study if patients feel respected during a consultation. From a scientific point of view, we are interested in whether patients with a chronic wound have a better outcome of their condition after being treated by health care professionals. Other goals are: whether the intervention of health care professionals does actually help the patient, whether general practitioners and their assistants feel addressed by the intervention and whether they are motivated to invest in the project. By using an intervention design, we can control and contain a specific problem for a short period of time in the work environment of health care professionals. In this study, the intervention consists of a general and a specific intervention project. The general intervention project is aimed at general practitioners and their assistants as a patient group to be addressed, although in the project it is not targeted that they are attending patients with chronic wounds. They are exposed to documentary material about wound management. The specific intervention project is focused on patients with chronic wounds. The project consists of dermatology assistants working with physicians in general practices, nurses with special training in wound therapy and patients with chronic wounds. This is a randomized controlled intervention study. By using data from interviews with patients with chronic wounds and log books of general practitioners and dermatology assistants, we will investigate whether: (i) wound management can be improved; (ii) whether patients have a better outcome after being treated by health care professionals; (iii) if general practitioners and their assistants feel addressed by the intervention and (iv) whether they are motivated to invest in the project. The results of the present study will contribute to the development of cost-effective and more effective wound treatment. A trampoline is a bouncing device which comprises a trampoline mat over which a jumper bounces. The device enables the jumper to perform a jumping or leaping action. More particularly, the device provides the jumper with a surface for jumping onto which, at the proper moment in time, the jumper will normally land on its feet for a continuous bouncing motion. Tr

Q: If template type is known why default template type is Template? If I declare a type template T: template class MyClass { }; I can add a function to my class to compile in different template types, if T was known at compile time, this works: template void Add(T & someobject, T param1, T param2) { someobject.Add(param1); someobject.Add(param2); } However, I cannot do this if I declare my class as a template, I get the error that Invalid arguments'void (MyClass) ' Since it's not possible to specify a template type when declaring a class template, why would the compiler require that I declare it to be a template with the default template type void? Is there a reason why you would want to use template with the default template type void instead of a specific template type such as int? A: The default template parameter is used if T is deduced as a template type: template void Add(); template void Add(T&, T, T); struct X { Add(X&, int, int); }; There is no requirement that the default template parameter be void. There are some cases in which void as the default template parameter may be a poor choice. See Is 'void' the correct default template parameter for functions? and Why is a default template parameter for class templates optional?
