How to solve this problem? I need an explanation in a way that I can understand it. A: The basic problem is the "N" in the bundle name, which "NovaKomput" appears to be a legacy attempt to avoid the DMCA. There's no need to use wildcards in the bundle name, just change it to something else. Are the Suns hoping we never see Chris Paul on the court again? In the preseason opener, Phoenix inserted a handful of young players and their new assistant coaches into their lineups and kept Eric Bledsoe at point guard, essentially daring the Rockets to run the point. They may have succeeded. The Lakers, Golden State and Portland aren't as nimble with their lineups. As a result, they're often forced into suboptimal plays simply because they can't identify opposing starters. That rarely happens in Phoenix, where the bench is so deep that the starters, on the other hand, are almost always locked and loaded. Phoenix is the most NBA-ready team we've seen for months. I expect all of this to change when the regular season starts. Phoenix has a long roster, but few players can stay in this lineup all season and hold up. The young players are going to need to play significant roles somewhere to be ready for next season. Meanwhile, the Suns' stacked bench is going to have to perform under more pressure than they've ever been. What it means: I'm scared. The Suns are without Isaiah Thomas, Channing Frye and P.J. Tucker, not to mention Archie Goodwin and rookies Arsalan Kazemi and Zhaire Smith. They're also without important reserves such as TJ Warren, T.J. Warren, Kadeem Allen, TJ McConnell, Garrett Ellwood and Shaquille McKissic. The bench is pretty good, but who is the starting four going to be? It will also mean that the young guys won't have much of a chance to develop, so it's possible that we won't see the return of the Embiid-Auburn Experiment at any point in the season. The Suns are more athletic and more equipped to handle crunch time than their division rivals, but the biggest difference is their depth. The Suns are the deepest team in the West at the point guard position. They can
